The book is divided into four sections, each of which focuses on a different aspect of environmental protection. The first section, "Land," tells the stories of people who are working to protect land from deforestation, pollution, and development. The second section, "Water," tells the stories of people who are working to protect water from pollution, contamination, and scarcity. The third section, "Air," tells the stories of people who are working to protect air from pollution, climate change, and other threats. The fourth section, "Climate," tells the stories of people who are working to address the climate crisis.

The stories in One Earth are inspiring and motivating. They show that people of color are not only victims of environmental injustice, but they are also leaders in the fight for environmental protection. These stories offer a much-needed perspective on the environmental crisis, and they show that we can all make a difference in the fight to protect our planet.

Here are some of the stories featured in One Earth:

- The story of Hazel Johnson, a Gullah-Geechee woman who fought to protect her community from a toxic waste dump.
- The story of Robert Bullard, an environmental justice activist who has fought for environmental justice for decades.
- The story of Winona LaDuke, an Ojibwe activist who has worked to protect the environment and indigenous rights.
- The story of Mia Mottley, the Prime Minister of Barbados, who has led her country in the fight against climate change.
- The story of Xiuhtezcatl Martinez, a young indigenous activist who has spoken out about the climate crisis.

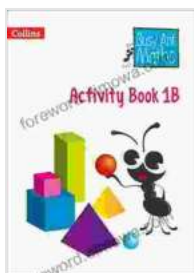

These are just a few of the many stories featured in One Earth. These stories are a testament to the power of people of color to make a difference in the fight for environmental protection. They are also a reminder that we all have a role to play in protecting our planet.
